A young woman who is here from the east visiting relatives, numbers among her admirers a disproportionate number of the younger men—mostly college boys or chaps just out of school. She likes them all and has only one complaint to make, and that is that they are "too susceptible." She is only finding out what all women learn—that the "susceptible" men are usually the impossible ones.

EVENING CHAT

BY RUTH CAMERON.

Mr. B. is decidedly too attentive to his pretty stenographer.

That is such a blatant piece of gossip in our neighborhood that it is impossible to be unaware of it.

I think even Mr. B. knows. I saw her the other day and her eyes looked red, and the lady who lives next door told me she has several times seen her that way.

The lady who lives next door and who happens to be a person of some discernment and judgment said some other thing.

"I wasn't surprised," she said, "I have expected something like this ever since I lived here."

"Why?" I inquired. "Is Mr. B. that kind of a man? I would never have thought so."

"Not at all," she responded with spirit, "but Mrs. B. is that kind of a woman. You don't see what she has to do with it? My dear, if you got lived where I do, you might. She is the kind of woman who devotes herself to her home and children so thoroughly that she neglects herself and her husband so utterly that when she draws a saint for a husband, and likely as not, even then—something is going to happen."

"Every morning when that man went to work he left a slatternly looking woman in a dressing sacque and her hair done in a while-you-wait knot at the back of her neck. Half the time that was when he found her sitting at home at night, too. She had been so busy polishing the parlor furniture or making every window in the house shine that she hadn't had time to tend to making her bed decent."

"And what did he go to when he left her?" As pretty a girl as you'd want to see, all fresh and dainty in a clean white dress, and her hair wavy and her eyes bright and her mind concentrated on how to suit him and not on any dusting or cleaning."

"Men are only human. Who's going to say that men are holy? I've known one of the older girls whom I particularly admired came up and kissed me. I was very much astonished at such a display of affection from a girl who was usually rather cold, and said so."

"But, Ruthie, I like you tonight because you look so pretty. Don't you always like people better when they look so dainty and nice?" she said.

In my heart I rebelled very strongly against that way of looking at things at the time, but since then I've wondered about it.

If you like or love anyone you are liking or loving all three manifestations of them, the spiritual, the mental and the physical, and when the physical is made more attractive, the mental and the spiritual are more attractive. It is not natural that you should love the whole person more or less?

HARVESTER CO. WANTS MORE.

Appeals From a Judgment of Seven Thousand Dollars.

The International Harvester company has appealed the case against the Myers, James and Johnson families from Mitchell county to the supreme court after getting a judgment for $7,000 in the lower courts. It is a most peculiar case, and the district judge's findings of fact cover about twenty typewritten pages. Ben F. and Pauline Myers, Robert and Mabel James, the Parlin & Orendorf Plow company, William and Henry Myers, the Prudential Life Insurance company, Kate, Jay F. George, D. C. and Dorothy and Della Johnson are the defendants. They are heirs of a Mitchell county estate and were sued by the Harvester company on notes given for farm machinery purchased from the plaintiff.

When the notes fell due and the harvester company tried to collect it found itself in a beautiful muddle. There were plenty of claimants for the estate, but none who would acknowledge the indebtedness to the company for the machinery used on the big farm. The lower court finally prepared an itemized account of the debts and fixed the indebtedness. The company was still dissatisfied and now appeals to the supreme court for a fuller settlement.
